Act I

It’s a quiet day in Seville. Soldiers loll about the town square and notice the arrival of shy country girl Micaëla, who is looking for Don José, a corporal. José is not there but Moralès, a sergeant, suggests that Micaëla wait for him. She ignores his advice and leaves. The changing of the guard takes place. José arrives and Moralès tells him that a girl was asking after him. José explains to Zuniga, a lieutenant, that Micaëla, an orphan, has been brought up by his widowed mother. The women workers from the tobacco factory spill out into the square on their afternoon break. Among them is Carmen (La Carmencita), who arrives with a flower in her mouth. She sings her famous “Habanera”. After the song, she brazenly approaches José and throws the flower at his feet. Intrigued, he picks it up but hides it when Micaëla returns. Micaëla brings three things from his mother: a letter, some money and a kiss. José sends a kiss in return. In the letter, José’s mother entreats her son to marry Micaëla. A commotion is heard in the factory; José rushes in and brings out the alleged perpetrator, Carmen. Zuniga bids José to escort Carmen to prison but Carmen flirts with José – she knows that he has kept the flower – and sings her “Seguidilla”. She sings of the tavern owned by her friend, Lillas Pastia, and the sexual pleasures that she enjoys there. José is tempted. As Carmen is being led to prison, she whispers to José to fall when she pushes him. He does so and Carmen escapes in the melee that follows.

Act II
Lillas Pastia’s tavern.

It’s a lively night in the tavern. Carmen, along with her friends Frasquita and Mercédès, and the soldiers Zuniga and Moralès, are making merry. Into the bustling pub comes the renowned bullfighter, Escamillo. He launches into the “Toreador Song”, one of the best known numbers in the opera. Escamillo flirts with Carmen but she rejects him. The smugglers Le Dancaïre and Le Remendado try to interest Carmen in one of their illegal schemes but she declines, saying that she is in love. Right at that moment the voice of Don José is heard. He has served a short prison sentence for allowing Carmen to escape and now seeks her out. Carmen orders food and drink, and sings and dances for José. Upon hearing the bugle call, José tells Carmen that he has to return to barracks, which irritates her and leads her to question his love. José responds by showing her the crumpled flower which he has kept as a memento. This is the cue for his emotional “Flower Song”. Carmen urges José to join her and the smugglers but he refuses and bids her farewell. Right at that point...
Zuniga bursts in and orders José to leave, but he refuses. In a crucial development, Zuniga is disarmed by the smugglers, which immediately places José in a compromising position. He’s now left with little choice but to join Carmen and the criminal gang.

Act III

A rocky place near Seville at night.

The entrance conjures up an idyllic world but we soon learn from the exchange between Carmen and José that their relationship is somewhat rocky. Indeed, Carmen admits that her love for José is waning and advises him to return to his mother. Frasquita and Mercédès consult the cards to see what the future holds. Carmen joins them but is disturbed by what the deck foretells for both her and José: death. The smugglers decide to set out for Seville to carry out a job, leaving José behind to guard the camp. Micaëla arrives at the hideout looking for José. She calls out to him but, mistaking him for an intruder, José fires a shot which misses her but almost hits Escamillo, who has arrived at the camp looking for Carmen. Madly jealous, José pulls a knife and lunges at Escamillo. The scuffle that follows is very nearly fatal for both men. The smugglers return and Carmen breaks up the fight, saving Escamillo’s life. The latter invites everyone to his next bullfight in Seville. Micaëla, who ducked for cover during the brawl, is brought out from her hiding place. She pleads with José to return to his mother, a suggestion that Carmen supports. Consumed by jealousy, José declares that he will stay with Carmen even if it results in his death. But upon learning from Micaëla that his mother is in extremis, José changes his mind and rushes off, warning Carmen that he will meet her again.

Act IV

Outside the bullring in Seville.

Excitement is mounting on the streets of Seville as crowds arrive for the bullfight. A warrant has been issued for José’s arrest but he has managed to evade capture. Frasquita has fears for Carmen’s safety. The toreador Escamillo arrives and is feted by the crowd. He and Carmen declare their love and Escamillo proceeds to enter the bullring. Frasquita warns Carmen that José is milking about but Carmen claims to be unafraid of him and even waits outside the bullring while everyone else goes inside. She and José come face to face. José pleads with Carmen to return to him but she insists that the relationship is over. Cries of victory are heard coming from the bullring. Carmen walks towards the entrance but José blocks her way. She rebuffs him once more and thrusts to the ground a ring that he gave her as a gift. Enraged, José stabs her. The “Toreador Song” rings out and Carmen falls to the ground. Horrified, they see José standing over Carmen’s lifeless body.

Love and Death in Carmen

For a work that is well over a century old and firmly entrenched in the operatic repertoire, it is well to remember that Carmen was at one time startlingly confrontational. Among the opera’s many surprising qualities is the unconventionality of the title character. The Gypsy woman Carmen is a rebel and a free spirit. As a member of an itinerant community, she is an outsider and is happy to remain so. Not for her is a settled existence with a husband, children and middle-class comforts. Her outlook on life is altogether more fluid. This is something that Carmen makes perfectly clear from the moment she first appears and sings her famous “Habanera”. Love, as she explains in the “Habanera”’s erotically sinuous descending melody, is flighty, thrilling and dangerous (forget sentimental notions of it being patient and kind). To love Carmen, we are to understand, is to share in these highly charged pleasures.

Micaëla’s rectitude stands in stark contrast to Carmen’s impropriety (and her chaste kisses stand in stark contrast to Carmen’s overtly sexual come-ons). Micaëla was written into the plot at the insistence of the management of the Opéra-Comique, the theatre that commissioned the opera. (She does not exist in Prosper Mérimée’s Carmen, the 1840s novella on which the opera is based.) Her wholesomeness was intended to act as a counterweight to Carmen’s brazenness. She’s clearly the good girl whom Don José should marry, a fact that he himself recognises.

Given what appear to be clear moral messages embedded in Carmen – among them the point that falling in with a bad crowd will lead to misery and ruin – we might think that bourgeois, nineteenth-century opera audiences would have taken comfort from the black and white morality tale that Carmen depicts. Basically, we witness the decline and fall of José, a good but weak man who allows himself to be led astray by a woman of dubious character and reputation.

But, in fact, Carmen isn’t a black and white morality tale at all, a truth that must have been recognised by the respectable patrons of the Opéra-Comique. It is Carmen who holds our attention, not José. Both musically and dramatically she is the focus of the drama. And while she might not be the most sympathetic of protagonists – she’s manipulative and emotionally cold – she’s tremendously magnetic. She is also resolutely her own woman and will live her life as she chooses, whatever the consequences. As it turns out, those consequences are shocking. She is cut down in the opera’s confrontational and scandalous closing scene (a scene that was far too strong for the likes of the family-oriented Opéra-Comique) simply because she refuses to bend to the will of her jealous former lover, José. It is José, not Carmen, who is the diminished figure at the end of the opera.

While not entirely successful in its opening season in Paris in March 1875, Carmen started to win over audiences with a run of performances in Vienna later that year. Among its many admirers were Brahms, Nietzsche and Mahler. Within a few years Carmen had been staged at opposite ends of Europe – Brussels in 1876 and St Petersburg in 1878. It made its way to Australia in 1879 with performances in Melbourne, Sydney and Adelaide. In fact, audiences in Paris had to wait until 1883 for a return season at the Opéra-Comique, by which time Carmen was literally a worldwide hit. The tragedy is that Bizet, who struggled throughout his career, died three months after Carmen was first unveiled. The creator of one of the most successful operas of all time went to his grave thinking that, yet again, lasting success had eluded him.
